They offer varied and interesting educational experiences at very reasonable prices. I brought my niece here one November when she was 10 for a squid dissection class and thought it was so cool (not really a girle-girl! LOL) After the dissection class, the squid was prepared and wham! Squid! He'd never eaten it before, but it was a game to try. Now she likes things. Then we brooded their lovely gift shop and got a few things, then did some beach combing for sea shells (yes, it was cold!), but we did a good haul. Last summer I took my 6 year old nephew to the Naval Festival they had and had a great time listening to the songs of sailors, doing scrimshaw and watching a rescue reenactment. The cannon was the best place! We also did some great beach while we were there and we arrived to splash in the waves a bit, it was an exciting first visit to the ocean for him! They have all sorts of really cool activities that I'd love to do, but haven't had a chance yet, like edible shore plants and star gazing. They also make plays. There's always something good going on in IRLSS! While the findings may not be as abundant as they once were, the beach area on the north side of the Indian River Inlet is known as Coin Beach. Naya - and the stories around some certain their - is a source of fascination for many people, and the sea witch guarding the Indian River Creek has demanded her fair share of sailing boats. In the times before lightships were parked along the coastline, and before rescue stations were built to provide quick assistance to ships in distress, passengers and boat crews making their way through the entrance and up to the bay faced countless obstacles and, if they got into trouble, had little hope of saving. Among the most famous Indian river wrecks are the De Braack, which sank in 1798, is a highlight of the Zwaanendael Museum in Lewes - The museum itself is a remarkable stop on the unique Delaware tour - and the Faithful Steward, which was wrecked in the herd off Cape Henlopen in 1785. The Loyal Administrator happened to carry 400 barrels full of coins along with the 249 passengers and crew, and for years after the shipwreck the coins would usually wash up on the beach. Soon, the locals called it coin beach. The beach today is more commonly known as a large bathing area and is part of Delaware Seashore State Park. But it is also a favorite destination for metal detector enthusiasts. You can still come across a lucky find if you are visiting Coin Beach. But if you want to increase your chances, go there after a big storm when the sea witch has churned up the waters. I don't know. If you pay your proper respects this just might be upon you and provide you with a taste of the treasure to guard. Getting there: Delaware Seashore State Park is located along Route 1 between Dewey Beach and Bethany Beach. Coin Beach is located on the north side. (19 December 2016) ... Every now and then you hear about a dime or two found on the coin beach. These are the old Irish coins from the shipwreck of the Loyal Steward (1785). These coins are mostly half a pence, but there were a few golden guineas. There were four hundred barrels of these coins on board and for years people have found thousands of these Irish pennies. You rarely hear about any other findings other than a hint or whisper of some potential treasure. Every now and then we find a quarter on a beach clean up. Yesterday Mark Stillman, the first companion at Theima Dale IV, found a piece of eight while detecting metal near Coin Beach in Delaware Seashore State Park. No, I'm sorry I'm not giving you exact coordinates, and there's not a single X that marks the point. The piece of eight coins dates back to the 16th century. There are several types and names for a piece of eight; real de ocho, the Spanish dollar, the eight real currency, or the piece of eight. The piece of eight worth eight reales, could be halved to two pieces worth four reales, or quadrants to four pieces worth two reales. Our modern monetary system is still based on eights, and today's stock market also operates at eighth dollars. These were the original Spanish piece of eight coins, which was a silver coin of one ounce. The back of the piece of eight found on Sunday Mark Steelman The one Mark found is much smaller than the Spanish coins, won't get picked up by a magnet, and has the cross temper on it, which distinguishes it from other pieces of eight coins. The original Templar coins date back as early as the twelfth century. Is his currency that old? Well, that remains to be seen, he's researching and asking fellow enthusiasts up and down the coast for help. This coin he found has some distinct signs in it and says I've just got this feeling there's something different about his currency. I look forward to researching and learning her story, which is half the fun, learning about what we find. So far it's possible he's from Lima, Peru. Who knows, maybe the coin belonged to a passenger on a ship, there is no telling the story or the source, but as he said, this is half the fun. One of Mark Mark Steelman's metal detectors is a serious metal detection enthusiast, when he doesn't work head boats out of Lewes, he works the Delaware sands. You can hear his enthusiasm for his hobby in his voice. He told me about many of his findings. I have a few friends who are in metal detecting and have been looking into it myself. The thrill of finding something cool, or historic is addressed to me. Then of course there is the hope of finding real treasure. Just talking to Mark, I realized there's a lot more to metal detecting than swinging this machine back and forth, and hearing about a beep. Everyone identifies differently, he said, we all have our own techniques. Kids who are really looking will spend a lot of time cleaning an area before they actually start detecting or listening. You get into a lot of garbage on the beaches, so you have to pass the trash. Metal tent stakes are the worst, they can be as deep as two feet. We need to get them out of there to see or hear about the real findings. You'll be surprised how many nails and casings we'll find. Mark described how he's looking for places to crawl on the beach, and it's almost the same way you surf fishermen looking for places that own fish, he's got certain circumstances he's looking for. Sometimes you can find a perfect spot to detect, but you won't be there for more than another tide or two, so you have to hit it really hard. My detectors are so sensitive that signals from mobile phones and WiFi in nearby buildings play havoc on signals. You need to go out sometime, try it and see what I'm talking about. I'll try it soon and tell you what I'm learning about detection. Sounds fun and who knows what I might find. Fish up! Rich King Prev Post Beach Conditions COIN BEACH Many #locals know that the beach north side of the Indian River Inlet, stretching all the way to the Indian River Life-Saving Station known as Coin Beach. The truth about the origin of this name is fascinating! In 1785, a ship known as the Loyal Administrator was wrecked off the coast of Delaware, just north of the Indian river entrance. On board passengers travelling from Londonderry, Ireland to Philadelphia, PA, as well as 400 barrels of Irish halfpennies & guineas. At the time, America was not trading its own currency. Instead, the currency was imported and used. This shipwreck predated the U.S. rescue service by nearly 100 years and as a result, only 7 of the 100 women and children on board survived. Also lost at sea were all 400 barrels of currency. By the mid-20th century beach-goers in the area could easily find these 200-year-old coins washed up after storms, nicknaming the Coin Beach area. Today, coins are rarely found, usually after nor'easters or other powerful storms and using metal detectors. The Indian River Life Saving Station Museum in Delaware State Coast State Park has some on display! Display!
